Working together on graded reader poster presentations

Joseph C. Wood
Nanzan University

Having students work in pairs to create a poster presentation for a graded reader is a great way to relieve the pressure of doing a standard presentation on their own, and gives students a useful opportunity to learn from their partners as well.

In this activity, the class will divide into two sides and take turns as presenters and audience. Audience members evaluate the presentations, and these peer evaluations are presented directly to the teacher to give a general picture of how students feel they are performing.

These poster presentations were trialed with my first year university students, and were quite successful. With some adaptation, this activity could work for other situations, such as high school.

RECOMMENDED FOR

Any level of students in an ER program.

PRE-REQUISITES

Partners need to decide on a book to read from the library. Students can share texts if necessary.

TIME

Three classes.

PROCEDURE

During the explanation and introduction to poster presentations class:

Assign partners

Have partners choose an interesting book that they both want to read and present on. This may involve some library and free reading time, which should be included in the lesson. You will need to organize this so there is time for the next steps, so budget time accordingly.

Give students class time to develop outlines on notepaper, discuss logistics, exchange contact information, etc, following your guidance in step 1. You

Movie Poster Presentation

Let's adapt a graded reader into a movie!

- Have students read a graded reader alone or with a partner (one not based on a movie).
- Tell them they will be “adapting” the book into a movie and should be thinking about which actors/actresses would best fit the book’s characters as they read it.
- Give them 2-3 weeks to read and design a movie poster advertising their new film.
- Students should prepare/think about how they will explain the “movie” to their classmates and explain the story, characters, etc.
- Half the class hangup their posters while half walk around and listen to the presentations. After 20-25 minutes, the listeners hangup their posters and roles are switched.
